

Domino's Pizza
drivers' wages
were slashed by 19% overnight.
Why?
...Hell, why not?

Domino's Pizza
drivers' wages
were slashed by 19% overnight.
Why?
...Hell, why not?

Domino's delivers a smaller slice of the pie - but didn't we make the whole pizza?

Domino's delivery drivers in Australia have received a 19% pay cut to their wages this year. Why? Because Domino's can get away with it. Not because Australians have all turned vegan and aren't ordering pizza anymore, not because a viral plague has hit Australia's hog population and sent pepperoni prices skyrocketing. No, Domino's is making as hefty profits as ever. It's just that Domino's decided they could make more profit for their CEOs by taking money away from their drivers. And they could do that because no one stopped them.

The union of the Australian Domino's delivery drivers is closer to the bosses than it is to the workers it claims to represent and went along with the company's cuts just to maintain their good relationship with Domino's management. Now Domino's drivers in Australia are stepping up and fighting back without their old union. They're moving on to form their own worker-controlled union so that they can reverse the 19% pay cut and gain some real power and respect on the job.

And that's why we're out here today, at Domino's stores across the country - to support our fellow workers on the other side of the world and show this giant global company that if they mess with one of us, they're messing with all of us.

Because that's how labor works. We don't get anything without fighting for what's ours. Bosses will take as much from us as they can get away with, and it's up to us to fight to keep as much of the value and worth of our work for ourselves as possible. And, ultimately, to have no bosses at all profiting off of our work.

Solidarity Federation - www.solfed.org.uk

Domino's delivers a smaller slice of the pie - but didn't we make the whole pizza?

Domino's delivery drivers in Australia have received a 19% pay cut to their wages this year. Why? Because Domino's can get away with it. Not because Australians have all turned vegan and aren't ordering pizza anymore, not because a viral plague has hit Australia's hog population and sent pepperoni prices skyrocketing. No, Domino's is making as hefty profits as ever. It's just that Domino's decided they could make more profit for their CEOs by taking money away from their drivers. And they could do that because no one stopped them.

The union of the Australian Domino's delivery drivers is closer to the bosses than it is to the workers it claims to represent and went along with the company's cuts just to maintain their good relationship with Domino's management. Now Domino's drivers in Australia are stepping up and fighting back without their old union. They're moving on to form their own worker-controlled union so that they can reverse the 19% pay cut and gain some real power and respect on the job.

And that's why we're out here today, at Domino's stores across the country - to support our fellow workers on the other side of the world and show this giant global company that if they mess with one of us, they're messing with all of us.

Because that's how labor works. We don't get anything without fighting for what's ours. Bosses will take as much from us as they can get away with, and it's up to us to fight to keep as much of the value and worth of our work for ourselves as possible. And, ultimately, to have no bosses at all profiting off of our work.

Solidarity Federation - www.solfed.org.uk